How did the Fund perform during the reporting period?

- For the 12 months ended October 31, 2025, the Fund performed in line with its benchmark.
- Optimism in the U.S. about the prospect of tax cuts, robust corporate earnings, and artificial intelligence was, at times, tempered by market concerns about interest rates, stretched equity valuations, and U.S. trade policy announcements. Short-term interest rates generally fell during the 12-month period, with the Federal Reserve and the Bank of England each making four rate cuts and the European Central Bank making five.
- Nine of the 11 sectors in the benchmark index posted robust double-digit returns. Financials, the largest sector by weight in the index, contributed most to its return, followed by technology and industrials.
- Returns were robust across regions as well. Europe, the largest region by weight in the index, contributed most. The weakening of the U.S. dollar relative to major European currencies also helped boost returns from Europe for U.S.-based investors. The Pacific region and emerging markets were the other two significant contributors to returns.
